self-sufficient, independent people, and they, most of them, are employed. And the federal government, having recognized this back in 1935 and on, eventually established the rehabilitation discipline rather than medical for the blind people because they are...the rehabilitation is the whole key to their employment and so on. Many of you go to the Mill. Right, Senator Schimek? You love the Mill down in Haymarket. Many of you go to the Avant Card shop on O Street. That's run by a man and built up and started by a young man of my children's age who is legally blind. He is not completely blind but he is legally blind. And so there is a shining example of someone who came along and overcame that, and with...he had a lot of help from the Rehabilitation Services for the Blind. The other thing I want to mention again, and so that ties in with the point that blind people are employable, and they are employable in significant ways. The people that I know have significant employment. They are not...it's not like back in the forties and fifties. One of the things that the blind people always had, and they did have it down here at the Capitol, down the hall, the little newsstand that was reserved in public buildings, federal and state buildings, for the blind people to run. So we've...we've come a long way from that. The blind people have established themselves as contributing members of society and the federal government recognizing this, and in those states, I want to point out once more, in those states where they have their own commission, their own agency, their employment numbers have gone up significantly. I want to speak once more about the question about loss of federal funds. They would lose the federal funds, and I think I'm saying this correctly, that Health and Human Services gets now because they are Health and Human Services, but...so they would lose those indirect funds, but they are still, as I sho...as I pointed out in the memo that we passed around, the soft match from across the spectrum of state services comes into play when they are asking for grants and for federal funds, and they can get private grants. Dr. VanZandt just recently got another private grant. So from that point of view, I hope you will not look at this, again, from the political point of view because...and we aren't over there, using that term "tearing it out" makes me feel like we're going to go over to the State Office Building and start throwing desks and things around. We are not. They will be in the same place. We are simply creating a group of people who can look at what
