SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: That's not...I thought that was the basketball coach we were saving 9 million with, but...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: (Laugh) No, he's going to be paid $9 million.

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: I see, I see.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: But that's over a three-year period, so the budget of the university can absorb that.

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: It's safe. I see. Okay.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Now I see things in this article that says, for example, officials who tentatively agreed. Then I see the term "the conditional certification". Then I see Douglas County District Court operates on a different computer system from the statewide court computer system. Then I see where some people from Washington may have to visit Nebraska in months to come. Would it be a mistake to believe that this is a done deal and that $9 million will be saved to the state?

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: I don't believe that's a done deal.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: I don't either, and that's all that I will ask of you, but I was wondering if somebody else has read the article?

SPEAKER KRISTENSEN: I have.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: I don't want people running around here thinking that $9 million that the state might have lost it's not going to lose now. This is as tentative as anything I've ever seen before. I don't even think the top official in Washington has agreed to all of this activity. Now the article was written by a reporter, and the headline was written by a headline writer. But the general thrust gives the impression that these problems have gone away, and I don't see that at all. Now I must ask Senator Kristensen another question, if I may, because he's kind of involved in this activity. Do you think that Douglas County District Court's computer system is going to be
