view the veto process and the overriding process as a battle between the branches. I don't also subscribe to the theory that the state budget is someone else's problem. Ultimately, it is ours. Ultimately, we are the ones who debate it, who prioritize it and pass it, and we are ultimately the ones that answer for it. It has not been that long ago where questions are raised and those who are critical of state government point to the rapid increases in spending. That's never directed at the executive branch. That's directed at the Legislature. And so it isn't a matter of I'm angry because my bill was vetoed. I am angry my bill was vetoed. I'll be back next year. The Governor missed a chance for some great public policy with the broadcasters...well, reasonably good policy. That's not the issue. The issue is that we're responsible for our spending. We have a process where we have winnowed down since day one of this Legislature bills, some left in committee, some left on General File, some that were left on Select File, others made it to Final Reading and a good number of them were passed. And most of the votes were made because, on an individual basis, bill by bill, there was a judgment made that this is good policy, because we vote on policy. We don't have a chance to go out, most of us, go out and use the rhetorical lines. We judge things on their merits. When items are vetoed they come back to us for what is, in effect, another stage and that is where we now have to make the decision. No one else will have this vote. There will not be any other action after we decide today what we'll do with the vetoed bills. We decide what that state budget is going to look like. It's unrealistic I think to expect people to take a line and say, I'm not going to vote for any vetoes. There will be some that will do that, but for the vast majority of legislators they're going to look at this on an individual bill-by-bill basis one more time, but my suggestion is that you now have to be somewhat discerning with the bottom line and not just the bottom line this year but for the next two years. You're going to have to make decisions about policy, but you're also going to have to say there's some good policy things I'm not going to vote for. And I think in all reality there's going to be some things that you say this is good policy and I will vote for today to override. But I think it's unrealistic to vote for all of the overrides because at some point in time the lament will be, as it was two or three years ago, I didn't realize that we were increasing the percentage that much; we've
