January 29, 2003 LB 122

relates to the parks question at all, for that matter, but I wanted to describe one aspect of this whole thing, which I think is very important. The park system...you know, we have dealt for a long time or we have tried to deal for a long time with the depopulation of the rural areas and trying to figure out what are those things that we can do that can revive that economy and rejuvenate that economy and augment that economy and supplement that economy. And you know the first thing, of course, is just the things that relate directly to agriculture. And to the extent that the solution lies therein, I think most people would prefer that very straightforward solution. But decade after decade has demonstrated that we're going to need something more than agriculture in the rural areas, some kind of combined economy involving three or four different kinds of activities in order to be able to perpetuate the population and keep the kids out there and keep everybody working at a useful kind of occupation and to increase the standard of living and to make it that place which it used to be in terms of the stability and the values out there. And one of the elements, I think, of that future is recreation and tourism, and a very important component of recreation and tourism in this state is the Game and Parks Commission...Department. We have facilities at Lake McConaughy. Fort Robinson is a jewel and can be further developed. When Senator Wickersham was here, I might tell you, Senator Loudon, he used to try to pour as much money as he could into Fort Robinson because he understood that there were jobs associated with Fort Robinson, some of them very decent jobs for people who didn't have jobs. Some of them were second incomes for families that were trying to keep small ranches and farms going. And I think that in bringing people into the state from Colorado, on their way to South Dakota, going through Fort Robinson or coming directly to Lake McConaughy or visiting a whole number of other reservoirs and parks sites, the fossil beds up north, not only are you bringing income into the state and into the rural areas of the state, but you're encouraging the city people in Lincoln and Omaha to help fund the problem in the rural area by drawing them out there to spend their money in the rural areas in a way that's very agreeable to them. And you can't do this if you leave the fee the same forever because, what happens, the buying power of the fee declines; consequently, the park system declines; consequently, the
