FLOOR DEBATE

February 10, 2003 LB 138

what I signed up for. But I do believe when most people sign up for it their intentions are good, and if they have something that is useful to somebody else that they would intend it to go there. And I think Senator Kruse really said it best. In the time of bereavement, this takes away any decision-making process from the next of kin, and really makes it a little easier for everybody involved.

SENATOR REDFIELD: Thank you.

SENATOR ENGEL: Thank you, Senator Redfield. Chair recognizes Senator Johnson.

SENATOR JOHNSON: Mr. Chairman, members of the body, I wanted to clear up a few things here and, actually, Senator Schrock kind of touched on one of the main components, and that is let's make it easier for the family. Because this is one of the problems, is that they wonder what to do sometimes. This is particularly true if you have a very dominant member of the family. When you visit with a family about whether the person should have an operation or whether they...when they do expire that their organs should be donated and so on, you kind of have to look around and size up the group that's there and pick out the dominant person, and visit with that person. Now, if that individual is not in the group, then the other members of the family are very reluctant to say that, well, we should go ahead, without consulting with the dominant member of the family who is often from out of state or whatever. So, from a practical standpoint, this kind of takes the heat off of the rest of the family and they can say this is what Dad wanted, or whatever. So I think it's a very practical thing to do. There is another interesting little thing that happened at the time that this was under discussion and what it was is this, is that there is some state that just got done going through the process of what to do if you vote and then are killed on the way...let's put...I've got to back up for a second. If you have...you vote ahead of time and then you die before the vote is counted, does your vote count? And this happened in some state where the mayor of the town had voted absentee and then, when he died, everybody knew that he was dead; did his vote then count? So that now this state has gone ahead and made it so that, even though you're
