March 10, 2003 LB 688

have you to put in your mind a large flatbed railroad car on a slight upward incline. Harnessed to the front of that railroad car are the football players with leather straps and harnesses over their shoulders, around their chests, and they lean against this flatbed railroad car to raise it up that incline. But they have more than the weight of the car. The car constitutes what they need for their own advancement, money to support the football program. But not only must they carry that weight, there are a lot of riders, too. Others are sitting on that car; all of the other athletic programs, the salaried employees, and then in a little caboose that is put up and fitted out like a pullman porter car, where they not only have sleeping accommodations and a restaurant but people to serve them. Who are the people on this little attached car and what does it represent? It represents what happens when Nebraska's football team entitles the school to participate in a postseason bowl game. University officials have their transportation and living expenses paid from money generated by the football team. Athletic department officials and employees, the Board of Regents, and I don't know how many other hangers-on are allowed to travel to the bowl games with their expenses paid by the football players' exertion. But here's where the injustice comes in, and I put this question to a person testifying for the university. The question is this, isn't it true that although the money generated by the players pays the expenses of all these other named groups and their families, the player who comes from an impoverished background cannot have one nickel applied to underwrite the expenses for his mother to come to the game? And the man admitted that's true. Families cannot get any assistance. And I asked him, does that seem just to you? He said, I cannot answer that. He was so intimidated, I believe, about offending the NCAA that he could not acknowledge an injustice that everybody sees. So here is the player running out of the tunnel onto the football field to play in a postseason game. He looks up in the stadium and sees all these rows upon rows of cheering fans, the family members of all these officials from Nebraska, their expenses paid by his exertion. But then there is an empty place in him because there is a seat that cannot be occupied by a member of his family because the money, while paying for all these other people to come watch him play, could not pay the cost of his family coming to watch him
