requirements, will set it apart as a different entity. And I don't believe it would be subject to a successful legal challenge based on Title IX or the way minor sports are treated. That's my honest view.

SENATOR ENGEL: Thank you very much. And that's one of my bigger concerns. Because if we did have to pay those, then that would just add...certainly add to their problem. Thank you. I yield...

SENATOR CUDABACK: One minute.

SENATOR ENGEL: ...the rest of my time to the Chair.

SENATOR CUDABACK: Thank you, Senator Engel. (Visitors introduced.) On with discussion. Senator Chambers.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Mr. President, what I'm going to do is something I don't ordinarily do, and that's to read from an article in the Lincoln Journal that was written about me. It's dated October 29, 1991. The headline: Chambers deserves round of applause--give Chambers credit for NCAA plan. And it was written by Ken Hambleton. Quote, just the name Ernie Chambers brings reaction from almost everybody in Nebraska. In time, it became a name that shook the NCAA. Senator Ernie Chambers, often fighting unpopular causes, and at times seemingly tilting against windmills, has won another big battle. For years, Chambers touted the fallacies of the NCAA. He was the first legislator in the country to seek to pay...to seek pay for college players, and was hooted. He was the first legislator in the country to seek scholarship agreements for athletes who were injured. And eventually the state, and finally the NCAA agreed. And that law that we passed said, you cannot lift a scholarship because the player is injured, and that scholarship must continue until the player graduates. Number three, he was first to seek due process for schools and athletes in dealing with the NCAA. That was by a bill that the university and the NCAA opposed. Eventually Nebraska and, finally, 11 other states followed suit with their own versions of due process rules the NCAA would have to follow in its enforcement. Now Chambers may have one of his biggest sports victories ever, as the NCAA
