commission or a county board and doesn't face the issue or give some reasons that they don't want it, most people, probably not all, are not even going to fight it. They'll say, if we're not wanted there, we'll go somewhere else where we are wanted. I think that's the practical side. Discussion about Senator Hartnett's question, to me, also leads us into that same area. We are number one now. We are certainly not going to stay number one or number two or number three down the road for the next 10 to 20 to 30 to 40, 50 years. And that's where we should be looking. We're not making these livestock investments today lightly. Even if you have a 10- or 15- or 20-year time frame, it takes a long time to get this money back, and it takes longer than that on packing plants. We're treating multimillion dollar investments here, and packing facilities particularly, extremely lightly. And Senator Jones mentioned about wanting to have small niche. We're encouraged in the value-added standpoint here to have small niches. And even...we can't even build small packing plants across the state, let alone the large ones. It was interesting, there was one being proposed in Minnesota to kill 4,000 hogs a day. It's going to be very interesting to watch to see what happens up there. To me, saying it very simplistically, everybody wants their cake and eats it too. Whether...and in this case, the consumer, we're taking for granted that food is going to appear on our table. And I could go on and on about that, but I won't, but just the things I hear in the last few days about the taking for granted of our food supply. It's going to carry over into the veterinary situation, the veterinary colleges. We want extreme food security in this country today, and still we're knocking out our veterinarian supply for the future. So we're going to see a lot of these things carry over into our budget. But the point really is, if we're not wanted in livestock in a particular county, let them tell us now. Let them tell us up front. That's all we're saying, regardless of the reason, regardless of the technicalities of the bill. Let a county board or a county commissioner deny it. And we'll move on and find a county that does, a livestock friendly designated county. Yes, come and work with us, because all of this mostly boils down to attitude. And I could give another talk on that, because I have been. The attitude in this state has got to improve. And it's got to improve on our ability to accept life as it is, whether it's
