there are areas of Nebraska that more than welcome livestock, if that would be a correct term. If you'd think about making an investment, if I was to move out with a 200-head dairy, let's say, or a few thousand head feedlot, I think you would probably, if this was to gain momentum, you'd look for a county that had this kind of a designation, that voluntarily offered up that they have access to feed, access to water. They are receptive to expanding their livestock base; that they look at it as a favorable economic, because I think we have to recognize statewide that isn't all the case. I made some phone calls to some of the letters that have come in over the last few months, and some people's...the dilemma is, I don't know if it's a problem, but the dilemma is there's...what's an acceptable size is very subjective. I called one that said seven sows in a pasture is the kind of hog production that we would like to see. The problem is reality and the ideal is colliding here. And I've got some issues here of about...and documented, you might say, of 2,000-head hog units 3 different places that went through all kinds of grief. Some got theirs eventually and some did not. The point is the size and scale that we need today, once again, is in the eyes of the beholder. Some are saying there's, in fact, there's counties in Iowa that have designated 500-head hog unit as the id...as the size, they're restricted to that. You just as well not raise hogs as to have a 500-head finishing unit. And so the dilemma is economics are providing a huge problem. You have to be so big to be economically viable. Many do not want that size there. Therefore, it's not economically viable. So it becomes a vicious circle. We turned you down because you're too big. Well, you have to be turned down because you can't make a living at that size. Now I've said before, and I think most of us agree, we don't really want the large, huge operations, but you can't deny that somewhere in here there's a size and scale that has to be economically viable and earn a living for the person that's trying to do it, or it's not worth their time. And, once again, the trouble is that becomes subjective across several counties across the state. I've talked to several in that hearing, after the hearing; said we are livestock friendly. But the dilemma is sometimes it depends on who you are. Sometimes it depends on where you come from. Sometimes it depends on how you got there. Sometimes it depends on where you're sitting in relationship to one other
