make people wear a seat belt and we don't mandatorily harvest their organs. I thought (laugh)...I discussed this with Senator Pedersen privately. I thought that was a bit much, you know, the price of getting to ride your Harley without a helmet is that if something happens to you, we're going to take your liver, and your heart, and everything we can get. I just couldn't get comfortable with that. And I...this was actually hatched in dinner conversation with Kathy one night because the ultimate test that we always come back to is if they ride the Harley without the helmet and something awful happens, God forbid, and there's a brain injury, then we all know about, Senator Jensen, I am sure, can tell us the details of how we impoverish people and we move them onto the state rolls and then we take care of them long-term at taxpayer expense. And that's when it occurred to me that maybe we should go back to an earlier era and a more primitive time when the law hatched a doctrine called assumption of the risk, and we didn't have the welfare state, and we didn't...weren't trying to take care of everybody from cradle to grave, and we didn't believe that you had an inalienable right to be prevented from making any mistakes. And we also didn't believe it was our problem if you made a mistake and suffered the consequences of it. I know this is all revolutionary today. We've flattened the earth. Although we found out it was round, we've flattened it and we engage in a great deal more simplistic thinking. And we manage everybody and everything in such a way as we all, by a majority rule, can decide it's good for everybody. But the reason I offer this amendment, I don't have a lot of material prepared like some of you, the reason I offer this amendment is I think this kind of frames the issue. You want to ride your Harley without the helmet, something awful happens to you, to the extent the law will allow, and that's...you have to search through all the federal and state legal requirements, and everything else, but to the extent the law will allow, we're never going to care for you at all, and you're going to take care of yourself. And that's the decision you make when you get on the Harley without the helmet. And I'm not saying it should only apply to Harleys and helmets. I mean, maybe it should apply to some other things. But in this particular contest which constantly occupies us, and we hear all kinds of new facts, figures, and opinions, but there is really nothing new
