of the people who don't agree with me, but I must bring forth to the floor what the people in my district have told me, including the guys today at the car wash who are working in an entry level job. Thank you.

SENATOR CUDABACK: Thank you, Senator Combs. Senator Chambers, I am sorry. That was your third time, Senator, sorry. Senator Schrock.

SENATOR SCHROCK: Mr. President, members of the Legislature, I just have to respond a little bit to what Senator Chambers was saying. My office was in contact with the Department of Ag, and they have a farm mediation department over there. And they are saying that there is going to be more people forced out of agriculture this year than probably ever. They just had five bankers call. They are doing foreclosings. They are telling farmers they can't renew their notes. Senator Chambers, I don't know for what reason or another, and you're not listening, so maybe I shouldn't say anything, but I don't know for what reason or another but there is more people going out of farming. I know what you say about the subsidies that farmers receive, but apparently it doesn't keep some of them from going bankrupt. Now I don't know if it's bad business decisions or what's going on. But I represent four counties on the Kansas border. They are, basically, a dryland economy, some livestock. Things aren't pretty down there. If you look at the incomes of the counties in the state of Nebraska, those four counties are way down the scale. They're almost as bad as a couple of those Sandhill counties. For what reason or another, I don't think there is a lot of prosperity in agriculture right now, and I wish the government subsidies could make up the difference and make it a prosperous economy. But I will say, on the other hand, for everyone that's having trouble, there is somebody who is doing quite well. And it's hard to point your finger at what the reason is. But I hear your comments, I understand what you're saying. I wish there was ways we could survive in agriculture without government help. And maybe we need to be weaned and we wouldn't...and we'd all be better off. I don't know if that's the answer. But it's been tough out there with the dry weather and poor crops in some areas, livestock that can't be supported on grass because of the drought. And so I
