FLOOR DEBATE

April 17, 2003 LB 610

this issue of this water bill, that's what I like to call it, is at stake. The Safe Drinking Water Act. As a political move, the former Attorney General, Don Stenberg, tried to have this act thrown out, and that's not going to happen. I ridiculed it at the time, and pointed out that it was a political move. It's wasting not only the state's resources, but any good will the courts might feel toward the state. Mr. Stenberg took a number of bad cases before the court, and lost. Now, when a person goes before an appellate court, the judges can and will interrupt you. I've argued before the Nebraska Supreme Court. I'm not even licensed to practice law. But I'm trained in the law, and I understand the law, and I'm a quick study, and I know how the courts operate by watching them. When you come to this Legislature, you can come in here on an issue and be totally uninformed, as former Senator Bruning often was. He might have gotten six bills passed the whole time he was in the Legislature. So you can make a fool out of yourself. You can refuse to answer questions. You can be flippant. But you only embarrass yourself, and maybe throw the process aside a bit, like if you get a hiccup. But that same attitude cannot be taken before the courts. Judges may be ever so egotistical. Judges may be ever so closed-minded. But the judges make decisions that have profound impact not just on the jester...

SPEAKER BROMM: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...who stands before them, but the state he represents, or purports to represent. So when I would go before the Nebraska Supreme Court, I would watch lawyers who had prepared their arguments. And they were bound and determined to get through that argument no matter what. So when a judge asked a question, they would give some incomplete answer, then want to jump right back to finish their argument, and the judge would stop that person. Here is what you see very quickly. You learn the rules of the game. And I know the rules of this game. My time is up on this time to speak, so I'm going to wait until I'm recognized to complete my presentation. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

SPEAKER BROMM: Senator Chambers, thank you. Your light is next.
