assume this without any more cost to the department, partly because it really does, is just identify some criteria that a county could use in being...in putting out the word that they would like to attract livestock. In Hamilton County, our chamber of commerce has done this. We have a program that gives some livestock to a high school student or somebody that would like to get started, and help them get started in raising hogs or cattle, and then they pass on some head of livestock to somebody else to do that. So our county is trying to do that. And we even had a program we was trying to attract the dairy to the area. It was unsuccessful in doing that. But one of the criteria that I was thinking about that the department said that they would use in order to designate a county as livestock friendly is that they would have to follow all the rules of our county zoning boards and whatever the county zoning laws are, that they have to follow that, and not to try to be able to get around any of this. Please hear that, because it seems like we've heard a lot of comments that we're trying get around the local zoning. That's exactly the opposite. And I know Senator Bromm introduced the amendment right to start with. The original bill did not have that, and said that after complying with all the county zoning permits, then it would take...this bill would take effect, the different aspects of it. One thing I think is very important, I think Senator Bromm mentioned, is that to be able...

SENATOR CUDABACK: One minute.

SENATOR KREMER: ...to access information from the university or from the Department of Agriculture, for the county board to either deny or permit. And let me say again, it seems like we're just thinking...so many people are thinking we're just trying to be able to permit more. But we also believe that there should be many of them are denied. And I think that's very appropriate. Factual findings, I think, in almost every county zoning board that I've spoken to, felt like this was a good part of the bill. Because to write down the facts would be very helpful. Some have said that this is going to only cause more litigation. The thing is, the last six permits, the way I understand, in Nebraska, that have been granted or denied, either way, have all gone to court. We have that happening now,
