not a lot of discussion, and that was true. I think if we move this to the edge, that is to say, to Final Reading, and leave it there, anybody that wants to start an argument on term limits will have something to start with during the interim period. The difference between getting 40 votes to put it on primary or 33 votes to put it on general election is going to be a lot easier on everyone than getting 108 or 110 thousand signatures somewhere down the line, when the ill effects that I am sure will follow term limits come into play. These term limits are already causing that problem in a number of states, the closest of which is a contiguous state, Missouri. I believe that it was again Senator Schimek who noted that they're having some problems in California because of lack of experience. Now, there are a good many people here, as events have proven, who have a political philosophy diametrically opposed to mine. That's fine. If that generates argument, it if generates some heat and quite a bit of light on the subject, I think that's fine. We're not down here to agree with one another. We're down here to represent our constituents. I feel, and I urge you to think about what the next step will be. If it does not bring about argument and dissension and discussion and hopefully agreement among the citizens of Nebraska, then we have failed in this particular instance. But there are people, as Senator Bromm noted, that have either awakened or are still convinced of the bad results of term limits. There are people in chambers of commerce across the state who have stated this to be their view. I think we should give them something to gnaw on. I think that if we do this, in other words, advance the bill to Final and leave it there, go no further, you have a basis for discussion during the interim, you have something for people to identify either with or against, and both identifications are good. We have everything to gain; we have nothing to lose. Leaving it where it is, it's like a dead frog on a lily pad. Nothing is moving. I'm going to vote against the bracket motion, if offered, oppose it if it is called for unanimous approval, and I will vote to advance this, and I urge all of you to do the same. Thank you very much, Mr. President. Balance of my time back.

SENATOR CUDABACK: Thank you, Senator Tyson. Senator Erdman on the motion to advance.
