Mr. Buffett does, lots of stock in his own corporation. Those...life will get better for those individuals and they will pay less tax. The...but meanwhile, life doesn't get that much better for people at the other end of the wage scale. So with the minimum wage corroding, it becomes, I think, the responsibility of the states, although I think really the federal government should keep up with this, but if they don't it should be the responsibility of the states to see that all their citizens are making a decent wage. To that end, there have been at least a couple of studies at the state level. One was done by the Bureau of Business Economics, a bureau, by the way, which I believe we've defunded, not because it didn't do good work but just because we were short on funds, and I think they're now scrambling for private funds, if I'm remembering correctly. In any event, they did do a study which indicated that for a family of two, a mother and a child, to reach a livable wage in Nebraska took even more money than what's being proposed in this amendment. And then beyond that, the Appleseed Center also did a study which was even better than the Business Bureau's study. Both were better than all former studies because they both concentrated on Nebraska. They were the first two studies, to my knowledge, at least in a long time, that purported to try to assess in a comprehensive way the cost of living in the state of Nebraska for our lower income people. And so that was good because it gave us a more focused idea of what it takes to live in Nebraska. But as between those two studies, this is the point I'm getting to, the Appleseed study, which you may have thought, because it came from a group of people who are a nonprofit who is generally concerned about the welfare of the lower income people, you would think that they would probably have come up with a higher standard of livable wage than would the Bureau of Business Economics or that particular group, because that group, of course, has traditionally worked with business groups and business growth and business development. But what was shocking was that they really tried objectively to come up with a figure and it was larger than what the Appleseed Center came up with. They determined that it really, if you were being fair about it, took more money to live at a minimum wage in Nebraska than the Appleseed Center estimated. But the Appleseed Center study was better in the sense that not only did it come down to the state
