FLOOR DEBATE

February 10, 2004 LB 139A

would buy these little cartons of milk, and the only way you could get the milk was if you bought it. So the kids that had money bought milk. And the milkman would leave, and only...the only deliverers of milk in those days were men. So the milkman would bring this case of however many cartons went to the school. Then they would be subdivided to give the number that went to each classroom. I was the one assigned to go pick up the milk, and I never had any milk. My family was impoverished. I could not ever drink it. And I didn't realize that the one who was going to be denied this milk was the one sent to run the errand and be the servant for everybody else who was going to drink milk, which meant the white kids. So I have resentments. But in those days, there were bad things said to black children in the classroom too.

SENATOR CUDABACK: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: There were monster movies...

SENATOR CUDABACK: One minute, Senator.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...in the theaters. Thank you, Mr. President. And the reason I liked them and identified with the monsters; in those days racism and segregation were so strict that there never was a black person in any monster movie. The wolfman in those days never killed a black person; Frankenstein never killed a black person; the creature from the black lagoon never killed a black person. None of them did; only white people. And I got a sense of satisfaction out of that. That's probably why I like monster movies so much. But then when the breakdown came in the racism, they put black people in these movies, and now we're always the ones that get wiped out first. I'm going to get back, when my light is recognized again, to talk about Senator Johnson's bill.

SENATOR CUDABACK: You may continue, Senator Chambers. Your light is next.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Thank you. Mr. President, members of the Legislature, in this example that I was giving from this movie, the guy approached this woman, and she was terrified of him.
