February 19, 2004 LR 14

argument the state of Nebraska made, and to say, you're wrong on this one, you're wrong on that one, you're wrong on that one, you're wrong on every one of them. And the most important fact in the case had to do, on appeal, had to do with the judgment of the district court with regard to the question of bad faith. And when you're on appeal, if you're trying to overturn the judgment of a district court judge, if you're trying to overturn his judgment on a set of facts, you have to show that he was clearly erroneous. That's...those are the words you use, that he was clearly erroneous. And, folks, let me tell you, from a lawyer's point of view, those words are a mountain, a very high mountain. It is unusual that an appeals court will find a federal district court judge clearly erroneous on the facts. And furthermore, once the appeals court has reviewed the matter, it is even more unlikely that any higher court would then find both the appeals court and the district court clearly erroneous on the facts. The appeals court went to some length to say that it was one of the strongest cases they had ever seen in terms of the district court's judgment on the facts, in this case, on bad faith. I don't know why this matter wasn't settled before we got to an appeals court decision. I think it was a failure on the part of the Governor and on the part of two Attorney Generals not to have settled this case, and to let an appeals court decision take place before they had effectuated a settlement, because now our leverage is almost nil. And we need to prepare to pay that judgment. There will be a request for an appeal, both to a rehearing at the appeals court level and to the Supreme Court. I think the likelihood of getting either of those is small. In any event, whether or not that happens, we are sitting here with a judgment that in all probability we have to pay, and which is accruing interest day by day, at many thousand dollars a day, every day we do not pay it. I think we need to do two things. And never more in our history are we called upon to be practical people, to be practical,...

SENATOR CUDABACK: One minute.

SENATOR BEUTLER: ...commonsense people. I don't have time to talk about both things. But to bring the item of relevancy back to the five minutes, we need casino revenues. It is not selling out, because everybody in Lincoln is going to the Iowa casinos.
