FLOOR DEBATE

March 10, 2004 LB 599

SENATOR JENSEN: Yes, I will yield. Somewhat. Certainly, architects and engineers promote the safety of the public. And to be honest, they would probably like their seal off on...

SENATOR BEUTLER: On everything. That would be...

SENATOR JENSEN: ...every structure that was...every...

SENATOR BEUTLER: ...the most safe, right? So it's really kind of ingenious. Because you're taking the Legislature out of the process. That's my...was my first concern. But it seems in certain instances here to be okay, because the interest that would be negotiated in the negotiated rule process are diametrically opposed, are they not? That is, the Board of Architects and Engineers, which is comprised of seven architects and engineers plus one other, their natural interest will be to maintain these exemptions the way they are, more or less.

SENATOR JENSEN: Well,...

SENATOR BEUTLER: The interest of the people that they will be dealing with will be to try to broaden these exemptions so as to be able to do things more economically, if you want to put it that way, or with fewer restrictions, no seal. So I feel kind of content with that tension there. Am I correctly describing the tension?

SENATOR JENSEN: I think you're essentially correct with that. Their rule making, however, should not ever be burdensome, I mean overburdensome.

SENATOR BEUTLER: Yeah.

SENATOR JENSEN: Certainly, they are interested in safety in construction.

SENATOR BEUTLER: Well, usually in this situation, at least until this point in our history, they come back to the Legislature and we decide whether they're...what they're doing is burdensome or not, and we change it in the statute if we
