March 17, 2004 LB 1083
