center kind of location. Those people exist now, they will continue to exist, and we will need that kind of care. I don't think people dispute that. Community services are cost-effective and they are the appropriate level of services for many people. I think we all agree on that. The system needs to be changed and examined seriously; examined seriously and changed. We agree on that. Now, places where we disagree is whether or not you can close a regional center by the Legislature or by the Governor, whether it's an executive or legislative branch decision, whether there should be a date or no date, whether there should be a study process. On the other hand, hmm, the study process would do what for us, when in fact we all agree the system probably needs to be changed, we do need a broader array of community services, we do need to keep a regional center presence of some kind in the state for those clients who need them? I just want to say that in fact we should be able to find, with that much overlap in our positions, areas of agreement. We should be able to find them. And we're not...I don't know whether we're not working hard enough, or whether we don't have the authority that permits us to find that overlap, but we should be able to. In the end, here's what I want to do. I want to be able to use as few regional center beds as necessary, but the ones that are necessary. They're expensive, they're costly, and the system is oftentimes a little bit out of date in those areas, and it will be costly to put them back together or to put them in one location. But we need to have those beds, and we need to know how many we need, and they need to be well served by people in the healthcare field. Secondly, we need a broader range of community services, and we need a serious presence in Omaha that is not there now. We want to make sure that we don't have a transition that leaves people in the lurch. We need a steady, smooth transition. I want to see that happen. And in the end, I think that we have more buildings and more beds than we need, at the moment, and they need to be consolidated in some efficient, effective way. With respect to whether this is an executive or a legislative branch decision, in fact, if you were to take a look at a political science textbook, it would be an executive branch decision as to how they arrayed those services. Textbook, this is an executive branch decision. Politics, maybe it needs to be legislative. I think that deadlines, if those deadlines move us towards
