March 25, 2004      LB 1034

Landis. I support what the Revenue Committee is doing. They've got their eye on the problem, and they are endeavoring to make improvements. I thank them very much. I will pull this amendment and support their effort. But I want to use this opportunity--and I thank you for your permission--to explain what my concern is. If you adopted my amendment, which would essentially eliminate the Nebraska estate tax as we will have it structured after the bill is advanced, you see that when it's fully implemented, then we're going to lose 16-17 million dollars. Well, some of us believe that we ought to look beyond the end of our nose. And so I'm trying to present a problem that I don't think is widely understood, so we can think about it now, become familiar with the facts, listen to the conversation in our coffee shops across Nebraska, and come back in the future and do something about it. We are incentivizing, without knowing it, we are incentivizing senior citizens who have spent a lifetime of labor accumulating net worth to leave the state of Nebraska. Now you say you have not noticed the exodus, and so it must not be happening. And the Department of Revenue isn't telling you it's happening, so it just isn't happening. I respectfully suggest, wrong. You will never know that senior citizens are leaving the state in this sense. So now let me back up and explain. As the federal government changes its estate tax planning approach and is responsive to the farmers and ranchers and small business owners who want to be able to transfer wealth at death to their children after they have spent a lifetime accumulating it, as this federal government gets it...what it would call gets its act together so it isn't penalizing people for dying and for having saved and for having been frugal and for transferring wealth, the problem is devolving--it's like a mandate, but they don't call it that--the problem is devolving down to the states. And the Revenue Committee and Senator Landis are endeavoring to deal with it, and this bill is one improvement in what we have to deal with. But I want to respectfully raise the issue that we need to address this more significantly in the future. We need to get rid of this tax, and here's why. Senator Landis talked about how people can use estate planning techniques to get around the cliff effect that he's remedying. You can use estate planning techniques to get around paying any estate tax to the state of Nebraska. And you say, well, we'll know, we'll be able
