FLOOR DEBATE

March 30, 2004 LB 888

SENATOR FRIEND: Thank you, Senator Beutler.

SENATOR HARTNETT: Senator Friend.

SENATOR FRIEND: I think what we could be losing a little bit in not translation between you and I but in translation as this whole conversation has went on, that builders can clearly...builders and economic developers can clearly benefit from this as well. I mean you're talking about a little bit, in some instances, higher cost of materials. The builder and the manufacturers benefit from that as well. The thing is, the kicker is here, I think, Senator Beutler, is if there is anybody that's looking at increased costs in things that would maybe be a hindrance on the front end it would be the homebuyer. But I...but based on the study, the university study and some of the study that we've done on our own, it's minor, and minor compared to five years, ten years out the cost savings that they will gain or they will attain.

SENATOR BEUTLER: So, so...

SENATOR FRIEND: I'm not trying to be rhetorical, but I mean it goes back to your point.

SENATOR BEUTLER: So you're looking at it more from the marketing side; that is, if you can't do this economically enough to have a market out there, then you shouldn't be required to do it. Is that what you're saying?

SENATOR FRIEND: Well, I don't think so, Senator. I mean I think that that's a concern. I think it was a concern from the very beginning. I mean I don't...here's my point. There is development going on in Sidney, Nebraska. There is develop...I mean and there's...problem is 82 or 83 percent, and I can get that exact number, 82 or 83 percent of the single family homes, the development, I guess if you will, the front end is being done in Omaha and Lincoln. But we don't want to hinder that if we can help it. So I mean it was a concern, but I guess the fact of the matter is...
