eligible for ISP. They are not eligible for ISP unless they go to the Work Ethic Camp and this is part of their ISP. If they don't agree to the Work Ethic Camp, they go to jail for an average of...their sentence would be two years, just as an average. There is no caffeine allowed at the Work Ethic Camp, no caffeine-containing materials, no soda. Even if there's no caffeine in it, there's no soda. There's no commissary and so on there to buy these things. There's no smoking, obviously. It's run very rigidly, a lot different than somebody who's able to access tobacco or caffeine and so on, on the street under ISP conditions. Whether they may not have been allowed to do these things on ISP, but I wager...

SPEAKER BROMM: One minute.

SENATOR BAKER: ...to bet they are at least smoking or some of those things. That's not tolerated in the Work Ethic Camp, a whole different situation than somebody out on the street on ISP. These people obviously have to attend the classes. Their rate of recidivism was questioned. The University of Nebraska at Kearney, Criminal Justice Division is doing an evaluation of that now, but I can provide these numbers; that out of all the people who were sentenced there up to August, I'm sorry, April of 2003, there had been 22 of them sent to prison for technical violations, meaning they didn't adhere to the drug use and so on; 4 offenders were sent to prison for new law violations; so a total of 26. I don't know what the recidivism is. It's based on three years of recurring or reoffending, and the work camp has just now been there three years, I believe, so that we'll have those figures coming down at us. But my point is...

SPEAKER BROMM: Time.

SENATOR BAKER: ...this...did you say time?

SPEAKER BROMM: Time, yes.

SENATOR BAKER: I'm sorry. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

SPEAKER BROMM: Thank you, Senator Baker. Senator Bourne.
