of language in the statutes makes my colleagues talk like they, indeed, are insane. Not one of them would go to a group of scientists and say this zygote is a human being, that this zygote has a body, this zygote has organs. They wouldn't do it if they have an ounce of sense, but as I listen to them here today, they would. And the scientists would just look at them. Or kids in a biological...in a biology class, and if they teach biology in grammar school, they would know better because somebody would draw a picture or representation of a cell. And they would ask how many organs does that cell have? And the kids would laugh; they'd say the cell has no organs. Then how are you going to convict somebody of doing seriously bodily injury or serious permanent disfigurement or protracted loss or impairment of the function of any part or organ of that cell, when the cell has no organs? What part of the cell was affected? I've got amendments to try to make this rational. Instead of talking about the body only, saying bodily or cellular energy...injury; instead of harm to the body, harm to the cell, puncturing the cellular membrane. And then for the other degree, puncture of the cellular membrane which results in leakage of the contents therefrom. Now that's what you would have to do to make this thing have some kind of rational relationship to the crime you're trying to create. Senator Friend cannot admit it on this floor, but if his wife is watching him and he says on this floor that he thinks a cell has a body and is capable of suffering serious bodily injury, when he walks in the door he will get a "Crawford kiss" from her. That's a hit with a skillet on the head, which is what Laura did to George. And he said he ate a pretzel and it made him lose his balance and he fell down and bumped his head on a carpet. That was a "Crawford caress." Senator Friend, I'd like to ask you a question.

SENATOR CUDABACK: Senator Friend, would you yield?

SENATOR FRIEND: By all means.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Do you have...how old is your oldest child?

SENATOR FRIEND: She's eleven.
