this. Certainly the people in the pork producing industry would be knowledgeable on this and I think they should be the one determining it. And if you want to become an agent, and there's a problem in your area, then I think that's appropriate. But until that identification takes place and until you've had this conversation with the proper authorities, we don't want people out there shooting something they don't know for sure what it is. And so, with that, Senator Louden, I would respectfully oppose your amendment, but I would tell you, if you think a better definition is available, we would have time on Select File, and I'd be glad to sit down with you, the pork producing industry, and Game and Parks to try and establish that. I don't, in my own mind, I don't think that's necessary, but if you think it is and you need to have this satisfied to...before you want to advance the bill to Final Reading, I would sit down with you and do that. These issues were all raised in committee. You heard the testimony. So this was kind of a surprise this morning, but that's okay. We're used to surprises in this body. If there is a problem, and that seemed to be the reason the bill was brought to us, because there is a problem, then I think you get the public involved. If there isn't that big of a problem out there and the problem is going to be identification and there's not that many to identify, then perhaps we don't need to do much of anything. I think somewhere along the line the identification is the important key to this thing, and right now I haven't seen where there is any identification. Do we have to catch one and do a DNA test on him to find out where he come from, or where do you stop for identification? Do you just take a look at them and they got big tusks? That was a description we got in some of the testimony in...at the hearing. And, of course, any hog that gets to be four or five years old can have big tusks. So
