ballot for them. Why are we afraid of this? I ask you that. I'm going to read something here from the U.S. Sportsmen Alliance. This is happening in our neighboring state: A national animal rights group is calling for an end to the use of traps in national parks. On January 25, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, that's PETA, and if we keep talking about this I can get you more information on PETA, announced its latest antitrapping campaign during a press conference in Rapid City, South Dakota. Imagine, our neighboring state, South Dakota. The group had taken issue with the Badlands National Park use of traps and is now calling for Interior Secretary Gale Norton to prohibit their use in all parks. The organization created a web site to promote its campaign. The site calls for trapping...calls trapping inherently cruel and urges visitors to contact Secretary Norton and demand that she ban them from national parklands. William Supernaugh, superintendent for the Badlands National Park, told the Rapid City Journal that banning the use of foothold traps in the Badlands would cripple some wildlife management programs. Through trapping, the park is able to monitor the health of coyotes, and he added the program has been crucial to the successful reintroduction of Swiss fox and the black-footed ferrets to the Badlands. So there's an example where our national parks are using traps to help the endangered species. Traps, I know, on surface seem cruel, but this is where the anti hunting and fishing people will start. They will start there, and then it will be a creeping type of thing, and we want to say, in Nebraska, we're not going to allow that to happen. I thought it was rather interesting in the...Friday's Omaha World-Herald, "Law angers wild horses' supporters." I'm not 100 percent sure what this has to do with this constitutional amendment, but for the first time in more than a generation the mustang, the very symbol of the American West, can be slaughtered, and I'd say it's probably about time. The federal government, in a facility north of Elm Creek, has probably, I don't know, has hundreds of horses that have been captured from Nevada and Arizona. They're wild mustangs, probably descendants when the Spaniards brought them over, and they don't know what to do with them, so they feed them at your expense. Now, I don't have anything against the wild mustang. He's not native to this country, but the federal government would allow slaughtering of them again. And, of course, there
