April 4, 2005

And I think it's very helpful to our discussion. And it's from the State Legislatures publication, and it's called "Medicaid: ten fixes that work." Of all the reforms that states have tried, these are the ones that hold the most promise. And it's interesting that several people who have stood here have talked about some of the things that are recommended. And I'm just going to mention these, for those of you who may not have looked at it, and for those of you who are following the debate. One is to reform long-term care. And this was done in the state of Maine, by making sure they were taking care of the sickest people who needed to be in nursing homes, but also because they expanded their community programs so that people didn't have to be institutionalized. The emphasis on prevention that Senator Brown just talked about. And this was in the state of North Carolina, where focusing on Medicaid clients for preventative health checkups resulted in cost savings. I'm just on the first page. Another one was, focus on the sickest people. And this has to do with disease management, which is one of the hallmarks of all the work that's being done in this country to get, quote, the best bang for your buck. And you have to treat people, make sure they have consistent care, and help them manage their diseases, and you'll have less expenses. I kind of disagree with Senator Engel. I don't think it's sniffles. I think it's people managing the chronic illnesses that they come before...into our Medicaid program with, that we can save the biggest amount of costs, people with chronic disease. Hope you have a chance to look at this, because I'm looking at amending another section of this bill, because I'm not sure...I think with Senator Beutler's amendment, which we're debating now, which I support, we get to a broader vision of what the "whereases" are. But in terms of the end product, clearly, the Medicaid budget is eating us alive. But healthcare budgets are eating everyone alive. Whether you're on your private insurance and you have higher copays and higher deductibles, or whether you're a business that's looking at your bottom line, or you're state government in the Appropriations Committee figuring out how we're going to take care of our state employees, healthcare costs are eating us alive. And so we have to look not only to our narrow little perspective on it from the budget, but also to what will happen. And as I've used as an illustration many, many times on this floor, it's like putting
