site. And in fact, the black-tailed prairie dog is described as a rather large, chunky, ground-dwelling squirrel, with upper parts pinkish-cinnamon, mixed with buff, tail sparsely haired, tipped with black. A squirrel. In Omaha, we don't have a squirrel extermination program. And actually, the prairie dog is considered to be a squirrel. That said, I would like to grant the remainder of my time to Senator Chambers. Thank you.

SENATOR CUDABACK: Senator Chambers.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Thank you, Senator Howard. Thank you, Mr. President. And now maybe some of the city folk can more easily identify with these little critters. They are of the squirrel family. But wait a minute. If they are members of the squirrel family, Senator Bourne, maybe I can understand why some of my rural friends are scared of them. Because we know what squirrels eat, don't we? We know what squirrel food is, don't we? Now, if somebody gives a description, and a person applies that description to himself or herself, the person who applied the description is guilty, not the one who stated the description. I said, Senator Bourne, that we know what squirrels eat. They eat nuts, don't they? If you were walking down the street, would you worry about a squirrel seeing you as food and chasing you?

SENATOR CUDABACK: Is that a question, Senator Chambers? Or did you...?

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Yes, I think it will be. Senator Bourne, would you respond?

SENATOR CUDABACK: Senator Bourne.

SENATOR BOURNE: Yes.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Oh, you would...oh, you mean you'll respond. That's what the yes...

SENATOR BOURNE: Oh, yeah. I'll respond.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Okay. Here's the question. If we know what
