on her desk. But Sudafed, NyQuil, these products, you know, they are...they help you feel good. I mean it's not going to cure your cold, but it's too bad that this is a base for some of the worst stuff that young people can take, not only young people. Now I'm sure that there are adults running around the streets that are going to try some of this methamphetamines or whatever they call them, to get high on. You know, I think there are a lot of things you can...young people can get high on right now. Athletics is one of them. I mean, you can go play volleyball, football, basketball, and I think you'll see young people aren't all druggies. I mean, they like to get high on playing volleyball, playing basketball, baseball, football, but there's always those few that, maybe they have just a little weakness, want to try something new, and once you get hooked on these products, you're done for. You're dealing with 10 percent of the substance that's supposedly is so devastating. So you tell people, we've got 100 people using methamphetamine. At most, if this bill is passed, there will be 90 of them continuing to use it, and the other 10 are going to find a way to get it. If these people who are cooking methamphetamine are so desperate, they'll break into grocery stores and any place where they think this stuff is. It's foolish and unwise to create the impression that this bill, even if you had the logbook, is going to make a dent in the availability of methamphetamine. It is not. And I defy anybody to stand on the floor and successfully challenge that. Even law enforcement people acknowledge it, so why do they want this? They say if
