the process. Thank you, Mr. President.

SENATOR CUDABACK: Thank you, Senator Erdman. Senator Chambers. And this will be your third time, Senator.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Yes, Mr. President. Senator Erdman was mentioning how short a time it was ago that he was growing up, and he's right. But in that short a time he forgot how long the program lasted that he was talking about, and I remember how long ago the program occurred, and I remember how long it lasted. But what he said other than that is exactly right. I had never thought about the resemblance between Senator Jensen and the gentleman that Senator Erdman named. But the mere fact that three people from differing points of view come together and give a hodgepodge does not mean the rest of the Legislature has to accept it. I will not accept it, and I believe I'm in a position to stop it. Does that sound arrogant? Makes me no difference. Even though we're at the tail end of the session, I'm still looking at the Legislature as an institution. How in the world could a monstrosity such as this--and I'm talking about the amendment referred to as a compromise--have any realistic chance of garnering 25 votes? What is the likelihood that the Governor, who is running against Tom Osborne--God Junior...now he doesn't think he's Junior; he thinks the other one is Junior, and he better be careful before he makes me angry. But at any rate, Governor Heinemann is going to look at this, and he's going to have people sitting around talking to him. And they're going to say, Governor, if you sign that, you have signed your political death warrant. It won't take Congressman and Governor-Elect or Select Osborne to say anything about it. Everybody who is concerned about safety will come down on you for signing something like this into law. Why, you could not even explain what is in the bill that led you to sign it, because you cannot explain what the bill does. And if you do understand it, and if you do explain it, and knowing what's in it you sign it, they'll say, he is out of his mind, and he ought to be out of the Governor's chair. I'm not going to try to defeat the bill to rescue the Governor. He's a grown man, and he can make his own decisions. But this is a decision that ought to be made by this Legislature. The mere fact that these different people got together tells you nothing except why the
