

TRANSCRIPT PREPARED BY THE CLERK OF THE LEGISLATURE
Transcriber's Office
FLOOR DEBATE

February 9, 2006 LB 173

bonehead. I get that. I don't think Barnes and Noble should be forced to give it to me, but I do think this: At the end of that time, why shouldn't it go to the state for me being a bonehead? Why shouldn't it be escheated? That seems legitimate to me. I don't know why Barnes and Noble should keep the money, and the state shouldn't, when they have given no value. All they've done is held the cash that got lost, if you will. I lost it, (inaudible), it's stupid. I lost it. It has value. But they are the finders. They're sitting with the money, and they keep it forever. What's right about that? I'm not sure I get that. Look, I like the idea of doing away with expiration dates; I like the idea of, you know, making that easier for the customer. But you know what? In the end, what happens with this is, they put the money in their pocket. It goes directly into their bottom line, and if you never charge the card, they keep the value for themselves forever, and they've rendered no value in return. There isn't a book, there isn't a dinner, there isn't a meal, there isn't service. All there is, is they sold a gift certificate and they keep the money forever. I'd just as soon it went to the state, where, if you abandon property,...

SENATOR SCHIMEK: One minute.

SENATOR LANDIS: ...it goes. If you've got some...if you paid too much to a utility, that utility hands it over. If you've got a savings account over time and you never go back to the savings account, W.C. Fields had hundreds of savings accounts that he used to get off...when he got drunk, he'd go into the town and he'd create a savings account. Well, after awhile, all of W.C. Fields' money is in the state coffers, because that money would have escheated. But not this money. This principle says...is, we found the cash at our location, sitting there, and we get to keep it forever, when the normal rule is, if you find this abandoned property in your normal course of business, you send it to the state. And I think the state is at least as legitimate as the merchant. It eventually will have a social good to it that it doesn't have. I understand where we're going with this, but I've got to tell you, in the end I think the escheat rule is just as good...