year. Now I don't know if that is the amount of money that we're talking about here; my guess is we're talking about less. But if we aren't talking north of a million bucks, I'd be surprised. Half of a million bucks, I don't know, and maybe Senator Bourne was told in the Judiciary Committee an amount of money that was applied, and if they did, I would accept, you know, some information. But in one year's time, I know from the special session, that it was roughly a $5 million amount of unclaimed property in a year. How much of that comes from gift cards I don't know, but it's significant. I'm going to guess it's significant. Let's round it out at some place between six figures and a million bucks. That sounds...rough justice figure to me, six figures, up to a million bucks. What I haven't heard yet is a reason why the money stays with the merchant in perpetuity. What I don't understand is why, after 25 years and the person is dead, it's the merchant's money rather than the state's, because understand what's happened here is one individual gave money to the merchant on behalf of another. It never got used by the individual who received the gift, and the merchant stands in the middle, having not rendered any service, other than an accounting one, for which, by the way, some fee might be reasonable. On the other hand, the use of the money for five years should have some value, shouldn't it? It's theirs to use any way they want. You don't think it's invested? Of course, it is. But at the end of the time, why is the merchant, rather than the state, the appropriate person to receive abandoned property? Carol was quite right. She was simply parroting the language that I used when she said, you know what? The bonehead lost it. And I called myself a bonehead. I'm a bonehead. I don't deserve that money. I don't...Barnes and Noble shouldn't have to do it for me. I get that. But why Barnes and Noble should keep the money to the end of time, after I die, after Brant Pope dies, and goes straight to the bottom line, as opposed to the public, I have yet to hear a reason. I'll sit down, turn my light on, but understand that the time line that Arnie Stuthman just ran down was the existing one. That's not what happens after this bill. After this bill, it goes immediately into the merchant's pocket from day one, and it stays there unless it ever gets claimed, ever, by somebody else. And by the way, they...at some point, you know what? There is no claimant; they're gone. They've moved; they're
