March 23, 2006 LB 690A

at the very beginning of the play. And then, to the satisfaction of many of you, I'm killed unceremoniously by, in fact, the title character, Macbeth. Now for those of you who might want to make the effort to come down and see the play--for which, by the way, you'll have to pay a mere pittance--you'll be robbed of the chance to see me physically killed onstage because it occurs offstage. However, you may delight in the rather bloody descriptions of my death that occur after I'm dispatched. I do have an understanding with the director that I don't have to stick around for the curtain call. If I have better things to do, I can leave and not appear in the curtain call. And tonight, as the opening night of the show, I, of course, have the chance of being dispatched, killed, and coming back here to hear the end of LB 690A. And it's a pretty close toss-up. (Laughter) I'm thinking maybe curtain call, maybe LB 690A, not sure. However, I will be leaving about 6:30 to place myself in appropriately Scottish and kingly garb to recite the immortal words of the bard. And you are all invited over the course of the next three weekends to come down and see the Scottish play and, if not see me die, hear of my death in great and gory detail. Thank you.
